6. The Industrial Revolution hurt family and social structures.

Throw a Wrench in the Works

1. The Industrial Revolution impacted society and brought significant changes to industry. These drastic changes eventually led to labor movements.
2. Before factories were created, families lived and worked together as social and economic units. Fewer artisans were needed with the advent of more sophisticated machinery, so men left for growing cities to work in factories. Women and children often worked in factories to supplement the household income, but were paid less than half the amount that men were. Spending 12 to 16 hours daily in factories left almost no family time, meaning families and society broke down.
3. Conditions were so dangerous and exhausting that workers began to push for change. In the first decades, they tried to organize into trade unions, but had little success due to pushback from the government and powerful business owners. Workers were fired and replaced with new workers when they would strike to gain leverage. For several decades, belonging to workers' organizations became illegal, and they had to go underground to survive, if they even did.
4. Unions not only organized workers, but also provided them with protection. Through the collection of dues, unions had money to pay injured workers. If unions hadn't helped, injured workers wouldn't have received any other compensation. Fortunately, by the end of the nineteenth century, governments slowly enacted legislation forcing employers to protect their workers. Unions became legal, and little by little, laws were created, reducing workers' hours, improving their safety, and protecting children.
